Female Marriage Migration to Taiwan The State, Legislation and the Wife-Mothers from Outside

ABSTRACT

This lecture examines female marriage migration from China and Southeast Asia to Taiwan. From the perspective of the state, this lecture analyses how the immigrant women are constructed by the state and how the construction is translated into citizenship legislation that aims to assimilate them into chaste wives and good mothers. The focus of this examination is on how the construction of Chinese and Southeast Asian women is differentiated pertinent to Taiwan's self-identity vis-à-vis China, a political and military threat to Taiwan's survival, and Southeast Asia, a region perceived as being lagging behind Taiwan's development. This examination is to be cross-checked by how Chinese and Southeast Asian women individually and collectively react to the differentiated and gendered citizenship legislation. In spite of the government's claim of promoting multiculturalism, this lecture argues that the citizenship legislation is utilized for ethnic nationalism. Nevertheless, immigrant women develop varying strategies with which to negotiate or resist the state's assimilation scheme.
